JOHN COX DILLMAN ENGLEHEART (1784 - 1862)

Circa: circa 1824

circa 1824

Watercolour on ivory (licence UES9CVAG)

Oval, 5.1 cm (2 inches) high

Signed on the reverse.

Original gold locket frame engraved with foliate design, the initial 'W' and date '1824' on the central to the design on the lid.

This portrait miniature is typical of the output of John Cox Dillman Engleheart, nephew to one of the most successful and prolific miniaturists of the previous generation, George Enleheart (1750-1829). John was his uncle's pupil and alongside Thomas Richmond (1771-1837), also a cousin. He later became his assistant.

Gone are the sky backgrounds of the high Georgian period, which his uncle exemplified. Instead, we often see, as here, dark, anonymous backgrounds with the sitter spotlighted. This example echoes the intense, almost gothic quality found in his remarkable self-portrait circa 1810, now at the National Portrait Gallery [NPG 2754]. The darkness that surrounds the sitter - now known only by the initial 'W' engraved on the case - increases a sense of intimacy as the viewer has the sense of being secluded with him. This is further enhanced by the artist's intimate focus on the young man, with him appearing very close to the picture plane and occupying nearly the entire height of the oval portrait. As was typical of Engleheart, the present work is signed on the reverse.

The gold locket frame in which it is housed also alludes to the private and personal nature of this miniature, which would clearly have been worn by the intended recipient. The locket has also protected the miniature from fading, and the miniature remains well preserved.

Engleheart had studied at the Royal Academy Schools from 1800 and exhibited at the Academy throughout his career, between 1801-28. He is thought to have set up an independent practice as early as 1807 and lived for some time in Birmingham before travelling widely on the continent. He retired from miniature painting circa 1828.
